This invention is directed to fabrication of microporous materials. The present invention relates to the fabrication of microchannels of materials such as single-walled carbon nanotubes or MWCNTs, and in particular to a method of encapsulating CNTs by SiO₂. Carbon nanotubes (CNTs) exhibit unique mechanical, electronic and optical properties. The high tensile strength and extreme aspect ratios of CNTs render them suitable candidates for a wide variety of applications, in particular for high performance structural composites and advanced electronic devices. The development of new fabrication techniques for thin walled CNTs, their assembly into macroscopic structures and their integration into advanced devices will be essential for their commercial realization. The current method of synthesis of single-walled carbon nanotubes (SWCNT) involves the use of a catalyst which is usually chosen for its ability to provide a strong attachment to the support and a high yield for SWCNT growth. Smaller or larger catalyst particles facilitate the formation of SWCNT bundles or aggregates which impact both the yield and distribution of the SWCNT product. Other than impurities, the main impurity in SWCNTs is free metal catalyst or graphite. It is desirable to isolate and remove these impurities since they can alter the properties of the SWCNTs, and contaminate the end-uses of the SWCNTs. It is further desirable to stabilize the SWCNTs within an insulating matrix so that they are protected from oxidation and other detrimental reactions that can occur when they are exposed to oxygen or other reactive gases. The thermal mechanical properties of carbon nanotubes are also attractive. The Young's modulus of single walled carbon nanotubes is about 1 TPa and is much higher than that of h-BN (0.7 TPa), h-SiC (0.5 TPa)
