PROJECTS®: Designing and building a window with lights (Part 1) Creating a beautiful and practical desk and sideboard with creative lighting When I moved in to my new apartment, I noticed an interesting phenomenon. I had spent a lot of time going through and planning out my possessions, and I had a rather long list of spaces that I needed to get together. Soon after I moved in, the room above my desk started to fill up. And then, I began to realize that I had been moving furniture and walking my dog up and down that staircase a lot. Right away, I knew that was the space that I would need to add lights to. The best real-life example of this is the industrial-style coffee table that I have in the living room. I use it every single day for hours, running my e-tools and following clients all around the country, so it needed to stay light. The old wooden coffee table I had lived in the space for six years when I was just married, and it's the same type of table that holds my sofa during the week when I just don't want to sit on the hardwood floors. See, as the human species (and as a dog, with any luck), we tend to hang on to what we have, even if there is value in the new stuff. And so, I had tons of tables that I needed to get together, and I didn't want to spend much money on them. I figured I could manage that by taking the four lighted tables my kids have and building my own custom desk with some lights. After all, I was spending $9/hour at Home Depot, and I can't think of a better use of those dollars! The lighted table I bought I picked out this one because it was made of metal and it's adjustable, and would hold most of my tools. I thought that was going to be my key characteristic. Yes, I also thought of putting screens on the sides and lowering the top, so I could use it as a desk. But, I didn't really think that was going to happen. After all, my welding cart has a similar configuration, and I don't use the screen version for that. Oh, I know that this is a great "set-it-and-forget-it" type of project. But, there was
