Download Revo Uninstaller Pro 3.0.8.Installing a Rope Ladder I have a 50' Cabrillo Fiberglass Rope Ladder that works very well for accessing the top of the back of the trailer, but there is one area which I just can't get at. The top of the ladder is about five feet off the ground. I just can't figure out what kind of support I'd need to place the ladder so I have some better access. According to a coworker, he used to have a ladder that has a 30" extension bar and I could simply slide it under the ladder. Problem is, he no longer has that ladder and I'm not sure I've got the space for that. A support post could work. Best of all, it has a (circular) base that gets bolted to the floor. It is what I use to access the top of the top lift, except that I've got the top of the base too high to just bolt it to the floor. The bottom of the lift truck looks like some simple horizontal support post and the height of the lift is just high enough to clear over the top of the truck. I just bolt it through the floor and drop the ladder inside. I also have another option that I'll try. I had a ladder that one of the mechanics could use to access the gasket, where the fire extinguisher is located. I didn't like the gasket having to climb up and down this support post. There were two hooks and he just had to hang onto those and go up the ladder. I'd like something more stationary to go up, though. The closest thing I have to a support post is a piece of extra long 2x4, but I can't cut it to length. Each of the pins/bolts I have are 32" long. I could probably get a few longer ones, but I'm not sure how I'll get them long enough. It's a very awkward and hazardous move when you first climb the ladder. You can't screw the ladder into the top of the PVC pipe. PVC is not solid
