Usefulness of fractional flow reserve in decision making to perform stenting before percutaneous coronary intervention in patients with ST-segment elevation myocardial infarction. We aimed to assess the clinical impact of fractional flow reserve (FFR) before stenting in patients with ST-segment elevation myocardial infarction (STEMI) to select the best revascularization strategy. Prospective registry of 95 consecutive patients with STEMI who underwent percutaneous coronary intervention (PCI) at Hospital de Santa Teresa, between April 2009 and July 2012. The FFR was determined in 94 patients. Primary endpoint was the 30-day incidence of major adverse cardiovascular events (MACE). The secondary endpoint was the 30-day incidence of death or serious adverse events (SAEs). Patients were categorized in three groups: (1) FFR \leq 0.80, (2) FFR $>$ 0.80 and \leq 0.90, (3) FFR $>$ 0.90. Group 1 had significantly lower 30-day MACE incidence (13.3% vs 38.3%; $p = 0.03$) and SAE incidence (9.7% vs 32.7%; $p = 0.038$) compared to group 3. FFR had a good discriminative value to select patients with STEMI for PCI (AUC: 0.876; $p = 0.001$; 95% CI 0.763-0.980), with a sensibility of 96.1% and a specificity of 46.7%. Treatment of patients in group 1 was mainly stenting (95.3%). Conversely, only 32.0% of patients in group 3 underwent stenting. Low thrombolysis in myocardial infarction 3 flow rates (TIMI-3 flow) \leq 2 was less frequent in group 1 (53.8%) than in group 3 (100%) ($p = 0.042$). FFR-guided PCI in patients with STEMI is related to lower MACE and SAE rates. FFR may be useful to select patients

The present invention generally relates to semiconductor design technology, and more particularly, to a semiconductor device including a clock/data recovery circuit and a method of operating the same. Clock/data recovery (hereinafter referred to as 'CDR') is a function that allows a receiver of a semiconductor system to avoid a loss in data transmission through the semiconductor system, even when a clock signal of the receiver does not have the same phase as that of a transmitter. FIG. 1 is a diagram illustrating a CDR circuit used in a conventional semiconductor system. Referring to FIG. 1, the conventional CDR circuit includes a clock buffer 110 that receives a clock signal CLK and outputs a divided clock signal DCLK, a data buffer 120 that receives a data signal DQ and outputs the data signal DQ in synchronization with the divided clock signal DCLK, and a plurality of logic gates 130 that couple the clock buffer 110 and the data buffer 120 together. FIG. 2 is a diagram illustrating the operation of the CDR circuit in FIG. 1. Referring to FIG. 2, the data signal DQ output from the data buffer 120 is continuously input to the logic gates 130. In this operation, the logic gates 130 output a data strobe signal DQS synchronized with the divided clock signal DCLK. The data strobe signal DQS is used to decide the point at which the data signal DQ is input to the logic gates 130. As shown in FIG. 2, the logic gates 130 are located in an element for transmitting data among a plurality of memory elements. The phase of the data strobe signal DQS provided to the logic gates 130 is close to that of the divided clock signal DCLK. The conventional CDR circuit is used to recover a clock signal from a data signal. To this end, the CDR circuit is implemented in a semiconductor memory device that is typically arranged to transmit data in synchronization with the clock signal
