It will be the version and license key in your computer.Q: A wire-less mouse click field A local contractor sold me a mouse for $20 because I had lied and said my computer was too broken to be fixed at all. Since I have no use for it and am surrounded by too many mice already, I wish to throw it away. It's a Logitech Mouse G 5 without the multi-button ability. I am attaching an image of the bottom of the mouse. What would be the components for this? The surface of the button when pressed is flat and seemingly doesn't press inward. I'm not sure if that is the actual shape of the button, or the shape of the field where the pressure is actually applied. I wish to turn it into an animation and link it to a MIDI instrument. A: The "feeling" of a pressed button on a computer mouse is generally provided by some type of mechanical switch located underneath the rubber part of the mouse (this is what I've seen on newer mice, at least). By understanding how the switch works, you could attempt to make a replacement. There are basically two common ways to accomplish the same function: Some variation of a slider mechanism. This will have a pair of parallel sliders and a fixed resistor. The mouse is designed so that when you press the button, the slider nearest the button contacts the top and bottom of the resistor, creating a resistance path which the mouse recognizes as a button-press. Thus you could just use a slider of the appropriate length and a resistor that is weak enough to give a linear feel to a light press and strong enough to give a momentary click to a deep press. A rocker switch. This uses one or more switches, controlled by an actuator of some kind, to toggle states. There are many ways to create a rocker switch, but one popular kind is like the "rod" in an old telephone switch (the sort of
