The KSP-3, a pocket-sized, radar-guided artillery shell, uses a fuel cell to power itself, unleashing its explosive payload in the form of a radio-controlled missile. It is produced by LaserNanoTec, a company based in Xiamen, China. A tiny, handheld device the size of a shoebox is supposed to release an artillery shell from a secluded, cave-like firing pit. The KSP-3, a pocket-sized, radar-guided artillery shell, uses a fuel cell to power itself, unleashing its explosive payload in the form of a radio-controlled missile. It is produced by LaserNanoTec, a company based in Xiamen, China. The device, known as a project known as the KSP-3, or K-3, is hailed as a revolutionary product. It can be delivered by special forces operatives, satellite-guided cruise missiles, or even a drone. The manufacturer says a metal shell can be launched, fired, tracked, and guided by remote control, without the danger of the operator being injured. But as BloombergBusinessweek recently reported, the device has proven surprisingly elusive. The gun's designers insist the K-3 can be mass-produced at relatively low cost, but the production hasn't produced the revenue projections that the company says are necessary to justify production. The company has a list of buyers who will

Native Instruments Session Strings Pro is a professional library of instrument racks and acoustic. Non-Player libraries cannot be loaded into the Kontakt Player, they are. This instrument has been specially designed for the studio production of strings, drums,.Sir, [@bib1] described the results of an experience in the identification of communities in a study of community nursing that they refer to as community orientated practice. Data are starting to emerge regarding the widespread phenomenon that many of us label 'patient group', 'diffusion community', 'community in health', 'community nursing' or what have you. We all recognise that the 'patient group' or 'patient-preferred term' approach has a long history ([@bib5]; [@bib2]). Many of us who do this work regard our research and, importantly, our services as directed towards working with groups of people, and who regard it as part of our practice to negotiate an agreement with people to give the intended title to their community-based work, even if one of us has some deep concern about the appropriateness of that title. The paper by [@bib1] shows that perceptions of appropriateness are influenced by, among other things, who is involved in the decision-making and why. This study is a particularly interesting critique of the use of language of 'hospital' or 'clinic' in the health and social care context. We accept, from what is said in their paper, that those who use 'community nursing' as a label for their work are faced with problems of ownership and should engage in negotiations to determine a name that serves their own purposes. We also accept that these 'negotiations' can be influenced by professional groups and membership of professional associations. The importance to us of the paper is that the concept of 'community-orientated practice' is associated with the achievement of a 'community' or a 'community-based' approach to nursing. This was not recognised by the study authors, and we believe that by being 'community orientated' we do not limit our nursing to the 'patient group'. We need to identify what it is we do with the groups. We need to describe and refine the definitions we use to name those groups. It is possible to be 'community orientated' without working with communities and we could say that this is done by all 'community orientated' services. Many of us, both as individuals and in
