One of our favorite sites, Amazon.com has a new service they are offering to their users. In the beginning of August they will be launching a new Beta Program that will allow Amazon Linux users to publish a Debian based image to their cloud. You might ask why? The Amazon Elastic Compute Cloud (EC2) is a Virtual Machine (VM) environment where you can get up to a T1/10 Gbps upload speeds. In addition to this they have a very fast network. In many cases Amazon's network will be faster than the network you are connected to at home. Think about that for a moment, you could be rocking 24Mbit per second or even greater, on a residential network, with no congestion, and the network at the office is running at 5Mbit per second, AWS is able to provide extreme transfer speeds. Their service has two keys to this service: Create VMs from images created from the Amazon Linux AMI. Upload the image to the AWS EC2 service. The key to the service lies in the steps to create and upload the images. In order to create and upload the images you will need access to an Amazon Elastic Compute Cloud account. This account also needs to be a key part of the new Beta Program. The Beta Program will be launched in a few weeks. Once this program starts getting momentum we will blog about it here at Electric Cloud. Another of our favorites, DigitalOcean is also offering a cloud based platform. They are using FreeBSD however. So although you have the same Cloud based network but you are using FreeBSD as the base and you will have to run the root level command: rsync instead of just: rsync. Amazon is also offering many other services besides EC2, just to name a few the service is also available for: S3, Elastic Load Balancing, SimpleDB, and ElastiCache.
