We will never rent or sell your informationIn order for the North Korean regime to survive, it needs to maintain a fiction of unity through the use of state propaganda. To create "massive public participation in creating a shared political sense of belonging" to the regime, according to academics Joseph Nye and Ha Tae-Lim, the state must first create people who believe in the regime in the first place. A new documentary from North Korea Watch highlights a unique exhibit in Pyongyang that shows exactly how North Korea does this. "The North Korean people's love for Kim Il-sung and Kim Jong-un is an integral part of their everyday life," said Kim Keun-sik, the documentary's director. "They will go to any length to show their devotion to the Kim family." In a way, these people who love the Kims are often the people who keep the state together. But that doesn't mean that they are helpless pawns for Kim's regime. North Koreans are fully aware of the situation they are in and are willing to help the regime, including through their own actions. North Koreans 6d1f23a050
