Photoshop 20.1 is yet another major release from Adobe, containing many new features for both PC and Mac and bringing some major improvements to the iPad version. If 2019 was the year that Adobe ceased to be an electronics company and it became a services company, the iPad ever-present was a key win for the company as it made keeping customers engaged with their digital skills and media content much easier thanks to the Ultrabook-heavy interface and capable hardware. What makes 2020 such a big year for Adobe therefore, is that it's not just a rendering service company, but also one of the leading AI tool developers and, of course, a company dedicated to software as a service. I can imagine that someone who spends a lot of time in Photoshop is going to be really happy with this update. The interface is clean, the options are easier to use, and it's a pleasure to use. Plus, it's available for download immediately. The in-progress videos and demos (which are being watched and commented on by Photoshop development team members) give us a real idea of just how well this upgrade is going. To quote the Photoshop web page: "With this release, we continue to pioneer the future: A new streamlined and intuitive interface, new workflows for more productivity, improved integration with Adobe's creative technologies, and much more. For the first time, Adobe offered advanced AI-powered technology to the world of desktop editing: learn more about the innovative features that will revolutionize the way you edit."
